

One bright summer morning, Ellie zipped up her red backpack, waved goodbye to her family, and stepped onto the bus that would take her on the adventure of a lifetime—a whole week exploring the majestic Rocky Mountains with her Year 6 class.

As the bus wound its way through valleys and hills, Ellie pressed her nose against the window. The mountains rose like giants in the distance, their glowing under the sea. She had seen them in books and on TV, but seeing them in real life took her breath away.

When they arrived at the campsite, the air smelled like fresh mountain breeze and cold peppermint air. Their guide, a cheerful explorer named Jake, greeted them. "Welcome to the Rockies," he said with a smile. "This place is full of wonders, if you follow me.

That afternoon, they hiked through tall forests where chipmunks scurried and eagles soared above. Ellie noticed wildflowers in every colour imaginable. She stopped to sketch them in her notebook, "wow this is so" cool

On the second day, something amazing happened. While exploring a rocky trail, Ellie spotted something shiny between two big rocks. She knelt down and pulled out a small carved stone in the shape of a bear. Ranger Jake smiled and said, "That's something very special. Long ago, people who cared deeply for this land carved stones like that. It's a way of remembering and respecting nature."

That night, Ellie sat by the campfire under a sky full of stars. She held the carving close and felt a strange sense of connection to the land and its stories.

Throughout the week, Ellie climbed waterfalls, crossed wobbly rope bridges, and even saw a real moose! She faced her fears, made new friends, and discovered how brave she never ne she was.

On the last day, she stood on a mountain hil, wind in her hair, looking out over endless peaks and valleys. "I'll never forget this," she whispered under her breath.

When Ellie returned home, she wasn't just a student anymore. She was an adventurer, a nature lover, and a girl with memories that will stay in her heart forever.
